What should I do if I drop a host?

Dear Padre,

Last week at Mass, someone jostled me as I received Communion, and I dropped the host on the floor. I picked it up, and the priest took it and gave me another. Did I handle that correctly?

Linda

Dear Linda,

The Tridentine Missal, the Mass book from the Council of Trent (1545—1563), gave a lengthy procedure for picking up the consecrated host, washing the area it had fallen on, and then washing the cloth used to clean up. This extended ritual demonstrated a concern that not one particle of the host be trampled underfoot.

We still revere the Body of Christ, but the current General Instruction of the Roman Missal no longer gives such lengthy procedures, relying instead on the common sense and respect of the priest and the communicant. If the host falls on the floor, the priest or communicant should reverently pick it up and set it aside for later disposal by the priest. No other ritual cleaning is prescribed.

If the Precious Blood is spilled, wash the area with water, then pour the water into the sacrarium, a special sink usually located in the sacristy that drains directly into the Earth instead of through the sewage system.

Sometimes, as in your case, dropping or spilling at Communion can't be helped—but it should be a rare occurrence. The host should be shared slowly as we remember that the One who feeds us died so we might live.
